The premise of Umberto Eco's The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana, may strike some readers as laughably unpromising, and others as breathtakingly rich. A sixty-ish Milanese antiquarian bookseller nicknamed Yambo suffers a stroke and loses his memory of everything but the words he has read: poems, scenes from novels, miscellaneous quotations. His wife Paola fills in the bare essentials of his family history, but in order to trigger original memories, Yambo retreats alone to his ancestral home ...

In The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana, that world seems to be quite personal. It is a detailed world of an Italian man re-learning his boyhood of around the time of World War II, when he was exposed to all popular literature and music of the time as well as some lesser known productions. Eco's verbose details of that era and environment are so lengthy that I (dare I say) skipped a few pages. Am I getting impatient in my old age? I did not feel that I missed any development of the story or ...

The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana is perhaps as close as Eco may ever come to writing an "autobiographical" novel. The main character, a middle-aged Italian who makes his living selling rare books, suffers a memory loss. This provides Eco with the chance to explore the relationship that every individual has to their memories, and to consider whether memory (and our thoughts in general) are truly "personal" or all culturally derived. So this work, with all its gaudy cartoon illustrations ...

The group to which Tim Tyler and Spud belong in the comic book series which includes The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana. The Oratorio kids in Ivory Patrol uniforms are a prelude the appearance of Loana herself and Don Bosco, founder of the Oratorio. The song they sing is one which Yambo associated with "the feminine charms of Ethiopia" on p. 192, perhaps very dimly evoking by association the ...
